It's Time for Love

There is something we don't talk about enough: how incredibly hard it is to date during a war - and Pesach, starting now, only adds to that.

I know this firsthand. For the first year and a half of the war, I didn't go on any dates. There were barely any suggestions, and the matches I did have fell apart because of miluim or other war-related circumstances - and it's been like that again recently too. I know I'm not alone in this. Finding people to date in the first place is its own challenge.

Now more than ever, people need connection - not in spite of the war, but because of it. Loneliness in hard times is its own heartbreak. Feeling chosen by another human being matters more right now, not less. This is the time to pursue love with more intention, more courage, and more community. It's also why I set up friends myself - because even if I haven't found "the one" yet, I can still help the people I love find theirs.

Shagririm Balev exists because singles deserve someone in their corner. A warm introduction from a caring friend can be a lifeline. Love is, in its own quiet way, an act of resistance - a declaration that we are still here, still hopeful, still building a future. We believe that everyone can be a shadchan! It's a community run database where friends set up friends - doing the behind-the-scenes work of helping the people they love find their person.

Pesach is the ultimate holiday of hope - the story of a people who refused to give up, who believed the future could look completely different from the present. Sometimes being single feels like wandering. But the waiting is not wasted. Just as we open our homes to friends and family at the Seder and over chag, we can open our hearts to making matches - to helping the people we love feel a little less alone.

Hope with a community behind it? That's a movement. At Shagririm Balev, we just celebrated our 500th engagement - and by the time this goes to print, we'll probably be at 510 or more! Whether
